MISCELLANEOUS READING.

COMMUNICATED. LINES.

Death to our household came, and rudely claimed Our youngest, but beloved treasures. He Who seemed too fair and lovely for the grave Was stricken down, ere, yet, his tender hand, Had plucked the first young opening buds of life, To find the hidden thorn that lurks beneath; Ere, yet, the sparkling water in life's cup, Had turned to bitterest poison drops; or E'en a cloud had cast its gloomy shade

Of sorrow, on his fair, young, childish brow. And when the tendrils of our hearts were twined About him, till he seemed in very truth The centre of life's hopes and brightest joys Death waved his ebon wings above his couch, And he was dead. But he died not gently, As the flower that droops, and slowly fades away, When Summer's bright, but fleeting days are o'er; But as the tender bud, all rudely broke By ruthless hands, or wildly beating storm.

But nine short Summers had his young feet trod Their opening flowers; and when the tenth was come, They shed their fragrant incense o'er his grave. For whilst the violet's eye was moist with Spring's Bright, glittering dew, and budding leaslets wore A softer shade of green; when joyous notes Of woodland warblers wild, woke once again The music in our hearts, and earth itself, Seemed animate with joy and happiness :

done! And earth's cold bosom, now, our treasure claimed. Him, that we had loved, nay, almost worshipped In our devotion, deep, intense, yet blind, We buried, low down, in the darksome grave, And placed the green turf o'er his golden hair.

Can mortal hearts a deeper anguish feel, Or agony more fearfully intense Than that, which fills the agonizing breast Of those, whose hopes are not yet firmly stayed Upon Jehovah's strong and mighty arm, When o'er the loved, death's mantle darkly fulls, And hides them evermore from mortal sight When its shadowy folds hang like a pall; Upon the hearts, that never yet have learned To cast life's cares, and weary burdens down At Jesus' feet; and with the eye of faith, Look for relief from Him, who heals and binds The bleeding, broken heart, and gives it peace. Father in Heaven! In mercy pity those Who bear life's burdens still, without the help, That comes from Thee, to whom is yet unknown The joy that fills the heart, that lowly bows, In humble, meek submission to thy will. Rappahannock County, Va.
